

Jon's Story

Name: _____ Date: _____

It's a sad day. Your only video iPod, the one you saved your money for for three years, is missing! While you are very upset, you are determined to find the thief. That being said, you cannot make up your own rules or falsify information. You must be committed to finding the true thief.

You have some insights into this crime, however, and are willing to share it to anyone who asks.

- First, your iPod went missing when your best friend distracted you from your classroom tasks.
- Secondly, this same friend had been trying for some time to get you to find more mature material to put on your iPod. Your friend was recommending some music from the 60s, the newest artsy comedy film to win the Sundance Film Festival, and to follow more refined and sophisticated personalities.
- You know that your tastes aren't for everyone, but you know of at least one other person in the class who shares your passions. You don't like their love of kids' movies, however.

You must find your iPod for all of these personal reasons, but you also know that if you lose it, your parents will think you're irresponsible and they won't let you go to hang out with friends on the weekend. Use your resources, knowledge, and classmates to help you find the thief. It does not matter if you personally find him/her, so long as the iPod is recovered.
